[From the Devenport Gazette, Sept. 30] Harris Sunk-Two Lives Lost The accident occurred at about eight o'clock, as stated, which is about two hours after the neual time of the Fanny's arrival. She was not proceeding fast to make up for lost time, but was going slower than usual at the time, in consequence of a slight fog or mist prevailing. In a conversation we had with the Cap tam, he said the boat was passing the piets of the Rock Island Railroad bridge, as he thought, handsomely, when, to his surprise, she struck the stone pier with great force, so that it sent her up against the big pier with almost equal force, which knocked the bow so that the boat's direction was turned toward Rock Island. The starboard guard was almost carried away, and the larboard guard was also considerably it jured by the collision, and the starboard bow was stove in; but it was very evident that these were not all the injuries, for the hold rapidly filled with water, DICK MARKHAM—A NEW NOVwhich stopped the engines, and put out the lights. It may be well conceived that the confusion among the seventy-five passengers on board was great, but their fears were quelled when the Fanny Harris's whistles were prompt ly responded to by the lerry-boat, which came along side in a few minutes. When Captain Webb found the hull filling rapidly, he determined to make for Rock Island. The fires and lights were relighted, and the boat steered for that point, but on arriving there, it was found to be too deep water, and the Captain pushed for Willow Island, where she was tun on a bar, on the bar as fair and square as though nothing edge of the channel, which Captain Webb passenes, the united efforts of the whole crew table passenes, the united efforts of the whole crew table passenes.
